Judithanne Scourfield McLauchlan, associate professor of political science, will share her presidential campaigning expertise with her students during her third Road to the White House course, scheduled for the spring 2012 term. Students will intern with a presidential campaign throughout the primary season.

Scourfield McLauchlan has worked on six presidential campaigns and incorporates her presidential campaign expertise in the classroom.

She developed this unique course during the 2004 and 2008 presidential campaigns, traveling with the students to New Hampshire for the first-in-the-nation primary. For more information, visit usfsp.edu/whitehouse.

“I strive to incorporate civic engagement opportunities for my students in every course I teach,” Scourfield McLauchlan said. “My experience at the White House and working for presidential campaigns informs my teaching, especially the development of my Road to the White House course. With the challenges facing our country, now more than ever it is important for students to become engaged in public service.”

She traveled this month to Little Rock, Arkansas with her family to participate in the 20th anniversary celebration of President Bill Clinton’s first presidential campaign. The weekend’s activities included an address at the Old State House, where Clinton launched his presidential campaign, and several events at the Clinton Presidential Library.

Scourfield McLauchlan worked for President Clinton’s presidential campaigns and worked in the White House during both terms of the Clinton Administration. She worked on Presidential Correspondence, Presidential Personnel, and the Domestic Policy Council.
