A grab bag of romp, burlesque and sheer entertainment suitable for the entire family is in store when "Master Pierre Pathelin" is presented by the University of South Florida Theatre Department. The medieval farce will be staged at noon, Tuesday Feb. 27, on the grass.

The translation of this 15th century French farce has been given extra dimensions by director James R. Spillane. He has added to the original story of the double-dupe of a lawyer and a shepherd the idea of having the play performed as it might have been done in medieval times—by a rough-and-ready acting troupe.

The troupe (an all-student cast) will enter the staging area pulling a highly decorated cart, inspired by medieval and Gypsy wagons. Its panels will then be converted in view of the audience into parts of the setting for "Master Pierre Pathelin."

Dancing, singing and pantomimic sequences by the troupe will precede the actual performance of the play. According to director Spillane, these playful actions will help establish the audience's rapport with the audience, as well as the spiritedness of the production and the nature of the individual characters.

Period costumes for the production will include initial, drab and coarse outfits worn by the purported acting troupe. A costume change into bright, colorful and exotic clothing will then take place in front of the audience when the actors assume the role of the characters in "Master Pierre Pathelin."

Live music on medieval instruments—including recorders and tabors—will be an additional feature of the production.
