Studying abroad is one of the best experiences you can have in college, and probably also one of the toughest.

I’m currently one of two students doing the Belgium Exchange program for Graphic Design majors, and being the first two students to ever participate in this program, the learning curve has come fast and hard.

What we were told to expect was nothing like what we have experienced so far, but regardless the past three weeks have been absolutely fantastic.

The language comes quickly out of necessity, and while the first couple of weeks are shocking and slightly overwhelming, soon you find yourself understanding what the previous week sounded like the teacher on Charlie Brown, except 100 times faster.

If you can, try to take a language course (or several, preferably conversation based) in the language that you’ll be speaking, because it will really help you. But keep in mind that people in the real world shorten words, speak in slang, have weird accents, and speak FAST. Try not to get frustrated. It will come with time.

I have six tips so far:

1. As the woman that I’m staying with told me (while we left her house 5 minutes before school started on the first day of class, when the drive would take at least 10), “Be cool.”
2. Ask the locals (duh).
3. Learn how to eat with only one tiny napkin, because you’ll be lucky to even get one.
4. Learn to accept Comic Sans (Designers, you know what I’m talking about). It is everywhere.
5. Embrace public transportation, because it is wonderful. Also, remember that the bus often doesn’t come, and at peak hours it comes full. LEAVE EARLY.
6. MOST IMPORTANTLY, always look around, and always look UP.
About the blogger

I'm an undergrad Graphic Design student, planning on graduating in Spring '14, and currently doing a semester in Belgium. A bit of a nomad, I was born in Argentina, moved to FL in 2001, and have been an avid traveler ever since. I love anything related to design, singing, and coffee.
