USF St. Petersburg professor receives Fulbright Fellowship

ST. PETERSBURG, FLA. (May 14; 2002) -- Ambe Njoh, an associate professor of public administration at the University of South Florida St. Petersburg, has been awarded a Fulbright Fellowship to teach at the University of Niamey in the African nation of Niger.

Njoh will teach courses in research methods and urban planning. He also plans research on the implications of French and English colonial rule on contemporary African socio-economic development. His classes and research will be conducted in French. The fellowship begins in August and runs for a school year.

Njoh began teaching at USF St. Petersburg in 1994 as an assistant professor. He received his doctorate from the University of London, where his area of emphasis was international development planning. He has a master of science in international affairs from Florida State University and a master of regional and city planning from the University of Oklahoma.

The Fulbright Program for American lecturers and senior researchers was established in 1946 by Congress to increase mutual understanding between the people of the United States and other countries through the exchange of persons, knowledge, and skills. The program is funded by the U.S. Department of State and is considered the United States' premier educational exchange initiative.
